

Color Explosion or Not

We often think of color as an explosion, the many colors in a rainbow. But how does color impact web design today?

In some cases, like the picture, it can be an explosion of excitement. But in our first example, the lack of color draws us into the design.

Color Limited

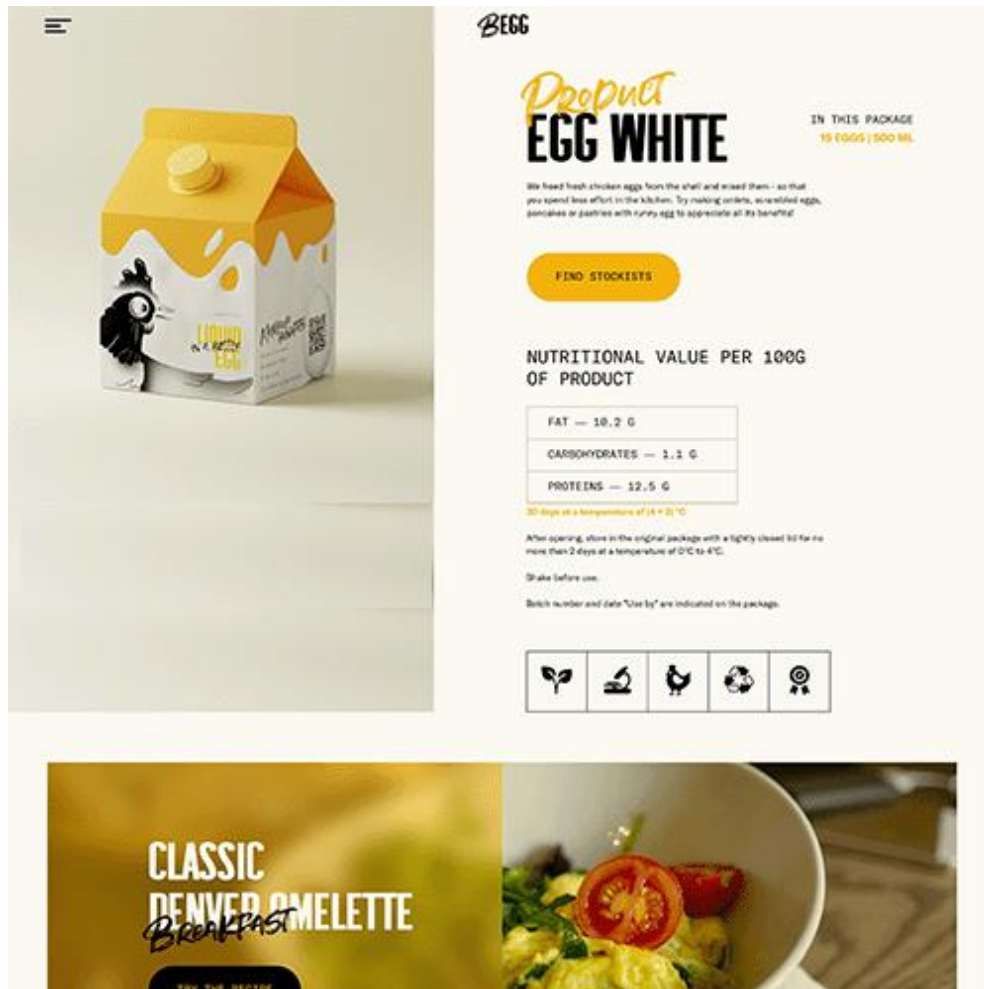

This is the home page of an egg distributor, not the egg itself, but the packaged egg product of liquid eggs or egg whites. Meet B- EGG, found on the internet at <https://www.b-egg.farm> .

They have selected a monochromatic style for their website, with a light backdrop. The white lettering on the home page does not provide sufficient contrast for easy access, but the black custom font does stand out and delivers the real message. The base of the page uses color to depict a liquid running off the page, well aligned with the liquid egg product.

The packaging design, using an egg yolk color, also stands out well.

The color scheme is carried out throughout the website. Along with the product. The action buttons also fit the theme. The only deviation from the color-limited theme is when recipes are used to demonstrate the product's uses. The title uses a color-consistent overlay next to a full-color meal, which conveys a sense of excitement about using the product. The only disappointment here was that the mobile version lost the full-color look and some level of that excitement.

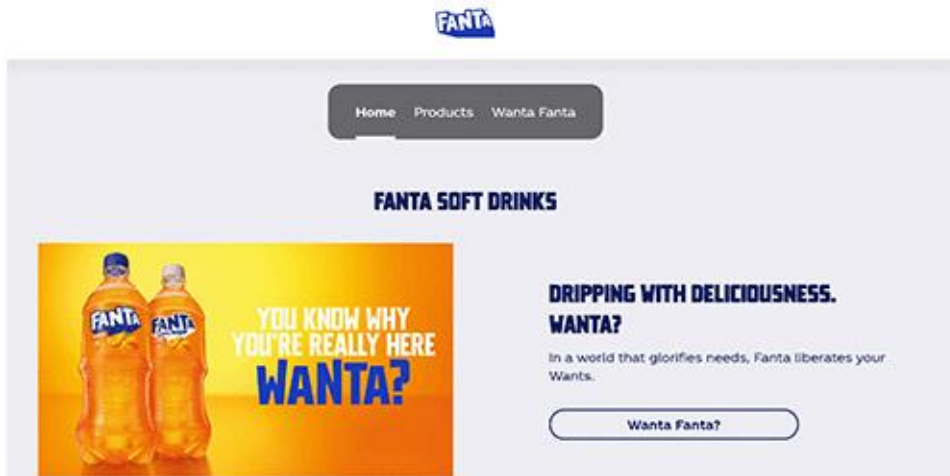

Color Exploding

The Fanta design appears to use a primary-color Triadic color design. This approach brings a youthful, vibrant design. The site does have nutritional information, in gray -let's ignore that tone, which is morphed by the merchandising page into a full triadic display for the fun stuff.

The intro starts slowly on the home page, <https://www.coca-cola.com/us/en/brands/fanta>

The full impact of the excitement comes from the free perks you can get by enjoying Fanta products. This illustrates the full prime color display, which looks better on my big screen.

The two sites are targeting very different audiences.

The first site is mainly targeting egg distributors and large chains of users and does not intend to sell directly to the public. But they do have a secondary consumer group, whom they respect with nutritional data and cooking ideas. This is done nicely in a simple, clean site.

The second website is really targeting consumers, specifically young consumers. So a vibrant, playful approach makes sense.

Knowing the audience is very important when choosing colors.
